Controversy has erupted at Rutgers Law School after a white first-year law student used the N-word while quoting case law during a professor's virtual office hours.

According to the Daily Mail, the student repeated a line from a 1993 legal opinion that included the N-word. during a video conferencing session with two other students. The student hesitated, saying 'He said, um — and I'll use a racial word, but it's a quote. He says, "I'm going to go to Trenton and come back with my [N-word]s".'

The incident has led to a debate on the rights of free speech on a college campus. Not long after the incident, a group of first-year Black students began circulating a petition pushing for the creation of a policy on racial slurs and asking for a formal public apology from the student and professor, Vera Bergelson, who told the New York Times she would've corrected him if she heard it.

Bergelson added that she was not made aware of her students' objections until the petition began circulating in April.
